This issue of engage journal has been informed by Interrupt: artists in socially-engaged practice, a series of five symposia initiated in 2002 by the visual arts department at Arts Council England. It considers the impact of participatory art practice on the artistic direction and culture of art institutions. Articles examine the issue of participation in light of the social inclusion agenda and discuss the implications for the artist, the curator and the gallery.